Quick tip: The new Photoshop CS4 has a useful new "quick adjustment" tool that lets you make selective changes using what Photoshop calls adjustment layers. These adjustment layers are one of the most powerful new features of Photoshop CS4, and we'll touch on that in the next chapter. To get started with Photoshop, let's select a few areas to start working in. You'll be creating the same type of project soon, so the design and content are important. The images you create will be spread across different sections of the page, so you can't just focus on a single section as you'd do with a single page. Creating a simple two-column layout with Photoshop CS4 The next step is to create a simple two-column layout like the one shown in Figure 1-1. For this simple example, I started with a blank canvas in Photoshop CS4 and drew a grid on it to help me out. In this case, the grid I used was created by creating a dashed line by holding down the Ctrl key (Windows) or Command key (Mac) and clicking the D key (Windows) or the space bar (Mac). Clicking the Create Dashed Line button in the toolbar will automatically place a dashed line across the image. To help you out, I added a couple of simple shapes to my canvas, like letters, graphic elements, and the logo. Figure 1-1 shows the basic layout I sketched for you. For this first attempt, we'll use the Canvas as our working area. Figure 1-1: Start with a blank canvas in Photoshop CS4. You can read more about creating gridlines in this chapter's sidebar, "Creating Gridlines with Photoshop CS4." Here's the trick to get to grips with this type of image editing task: Start small. Use simple lines to help you get the hang of the process. You can always go back and add more or change anything if you need to, but at this early stage, it's best to keep things simple to get things going. Let's start by duplicating the letter "H" and position it in the center of the image. Click the Create New Layer button in the Layers panel to start a new layer. You can then delete the first "H" you created to make it go away. For this exercise, you do not need to create a new selection. Instead, you can simply click and

Hidden away in a warehouse on the outskirts of Vancouver, Canada, sits one of the world's most powerful weapons: the Bell Boeing V22 Osprey. Operated by Canadian military forces, the Osprey has earned the nickname, "Air Beast," and it's designed to carry more than twenty-five military troops or their gear more than 400 miles via mountainous, and often remote, terrain. The Osprey has a single two-rotor, twin-engine jet engine that powers it through the air, delivering speeds approaching 200 miles per hour. And it is that speed, that power, and that durability that has made the Bell Boeing V22 Osprey an essential tool for military forces around the world. Its twin rotors and twin jet engines allow the aircraft to fly at 150 knots or more while also climbing at a rate of 1,600 feet per minute. Boasting more than twenty-five feet of cargo space, it can lift more than 2,000 pounds of gear, an amount that just doesn't seem possible given its size and weight. For the time being, the Bell Boeing V22 Osprey is used primarily in special operations by the U.S. Air Force, Marine Corps, and Army. It's no surprise then, that the United States has been steadily working to develop its own version of the Osprey, an aircraft that's more than capable of carrying heavy military equipment. With a maximum range of approximately 2,000 miles, the United States Marine Corps has already deployed its own Osprey in the past. The aircraft made its debut in October of 2013, when it flew from San Diego to Camp Lejeune, North Carolina. At the time, the Osprey was on display at the National Defense Industrial Association annual conference, but the aircraft wasn't completely operational. The aircraft arrived with two engines, and it took those engines nearly a year before the Osprey was flown. Unfortunately, that sort of time and money isn't available for modern U.S. special operations forces, which is why the Osprey will continue to serve as the U.S. Marine Corps' primary utility aircraft for many years to come. The F-35 Lightning II is the latest version of the United States' modern fighter aircraft. It is designed as a multirole warfighter aircraft and is in the final stages of development. The United

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is pulling back from controversial behavior-detection sting operations after new evidence prompted the province's Information and Privacy Commissioner to call for a "full and public review" of the program. After a sweeping review into the cases of two homeless women arrested during 2010 and 2011, the RCMP's British Columbia E-Crime Unit decided to abandon the unit's previous approach of "working with the people" to catch criminals. Instead, it has reached out to a variety of more conventional police partners, including the notorious Vancouver force's gang task force that is charged with busting members of street gangs. Story continues below advertisement "The results in Vancouver have not been positive," said RCMP inspector Darrell Turnquist, who oversees the behavior-detection unit in B.C. "We have not found the links, and if we did find the links we don't have the resources to do the work to make the arrests. Until we do have those resources in Vancouver and other places, we just have to look for other partnerships. It's not like we have just taken our hands off the fence and backed away." On Tuesday, Mr. Turnquist said the unit - which focuses on the most serious crimes in the province - has been looking at various ways to work with partners, including the southern Vancouver Police Department. The RCMP has already abandoned its previous methods in B.C. after years of complaints and legal challenges. In August, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld an earlier ruling that said the RCMP had violated federal privacy laws when it arrested and charged a man for "assisting in the commission of crimes" in 2008. The RCMP's behaviour-detection unit was set up in 2005 to help address concerns that otherwise law-abiding people were being targeted in police stings. The unit goes after people in public spaces who exhibit suspicious behaviour, such as people congregating in public places or walking in groups. During the RCMP's review, it said it reviewed hundreds of cases in which the unit had allegedly made criminal arrests and detected individuals who later failed to show up for court dates. Story continues below advertisement According to the review, the Mounties made about 25,000 "drug and gang-related" arrests between 2006 and 2011. But it also found that in many of these cases, the unit had responded within 48 hours to complaints of suspicious behaviour and made no arrests. RCMP inspector John Pritchard, the public complaints
